Helping Transportation Move Forward

The federal budget for transportation is over $66 billion.

Accountability poses an enormous challenge for transportation agencies receiving federal funds.

Organizations are under pressure to improve performance, demonstrate value for money, ensure compliance and deliver efficient services to all constituents.

A drive for optimal achievement — doing more with less — is everywhere: asset management, procurement, maintenance, planning, staffing and other areas of transportation operations.

Despite budget and funding constraints, transportation agencies are now, more than ever, expected to diligently comply with regulations and policies that govern grant management.

SOUND BUSINESS

Compliance ensures continued funding of critical initiatives and, when properly used, has become a valued management tool that improves transparency, reinforces exemplary practices, reports what is working, identifies opportunities for improvement and promotes continual improvements in quality, efficiency and effectiveness.

Transportation agencies that adopt compliance best practices are proven to receive more discretionary funding, have more effective programs, provide better services to their target populations and are less likely to be exposed to audit exceptions and grant paybacks.

COMPLIANCE CHALLENGES

While compliance has many beneficial effects, most agencies point to several common contributors leading to compliance problems:

- Staff turnover
- Inadequate resources
- Lack of understanding of roles and responsibilities of staff
- Inadequate training and education
- Inadequate management reporting and financial management systems
- Outdated or nonexistent policies and procedures
- An institutionalized perception that internal control systems are not necessary

PROACTIVE APPROACH

The most proactive approach to resolving federal grant compliance problems is to avoid their occurrence. Milligan & Company emphasizes detecting and solving regulatory requirement and grants management problems before auditors or a Federal agency identify them.

For many clients, Milligan & Company provides preventative grants management and financial oversight counseling through routine reviews that achieve early identification of potential issues and enables us to develop creative and effort-saving solutions.
